

Part 1: Argument & Concept Reconstruction

- Nguyen & Agency: According to Nguyen's "Philosophy of Games," how does the medium of games uniquely manipulate player agency compared to traditional art forms?
- Gentile & Violence: Briefly explain Gentile's core argument regarding media violence. What are two dimensions he identifies that explain why these effects do not manifest identically across all players?
- Cogburn, Silcox, & Ethics: Drawing on Chapter 3 of Cogburn & Silcox, how do the authors philosophically evaluate the ethical implications of enacting virtual violence?
- Gendler & Imaginative Resistance: How does Gendler define the "puzzle of imaginative resistance"?

Part 2: Concept Application

- Applying the Gamer's Dilemma: Select a specific video game you have played that allows or encourages you to commit an act considered morally wrong in the real world. Briefly describe the context of this action within the game, then apply Morgan Luck's "The Gamer's Dilemma" to your experience. Does your willingness or reluctance to perform this specific virtual act support or challenge Luck's argument about how we evaluate different virtual transgressions?
- Applying Imaginative Resistance: Provide a brief example of how Gendler's "imaginative resistance" might occur for a player navigating a morally complex narrative choice in a specific video game you have played.
- Applying Real-World Morality: Synthesizing Cogburn & Silcox's Chapter 3 with Luck's dilemma, how should a player's real-world moral framework interact with their in-game behavior? Support your answer with a concrete example from your own gameplay experience.
